The purpose of this study is to test a group of female adolescents who have been identified as "victims" of sexual abuse and to gather preliminary data about the effects of childhood victimization on the adolescent development. The research will be done in two phases. In the first phase, the adolescents will be interviewed about their experiences of abuse and coping with it. In addition, the adolescents will be assessed on a group of theoretical constructs which have been found in the literature to be related to the issue of treatment for sexual abuse (i.e., treatment for victims). In the second phase, the adolescents will be asked to complete a longitudinal study of their development. At the end of the first year of the study, a follow-up interview will be conducted with the female adolescents. At the end of the second year of the study, a follow-up interview will be conducted with the female adolescents and a male child of each who has been identified as a perpetrator of sexual abuse. It is hypothesized that certain of the early experiences of sexual abuse in the life of the female adolescent will influence some of the theoretically related variables at the end of the two year study. Description of the Related Art In a color cathode ray tube, the electron beam emitted from an electron gun is directed to a phosphor screen through an electron beam passage, thus causing light generated by the phosphor screen to be displayed. Recently, a large area color cathode ray tube, which is capable of providing a high resolution, is developed. In addition, a large area color cathode ray tube, which is capable of providing a high luminance, is developed. FIG. 1 is a cross-sectional view of an electron gun. As shown in FIG. 1, in a conventional electron gun, a first grid 10, a second grid 20 and a third grid 30 are disposed inside a cathode assembly 1. The second grid 20 and the third grid 30 are provided with electron beam passages 20a and 30a, respectively. The electron gun of FIG. 1 is used for a cathode ray tube in which an anode is not used. Thus, when a voltage is applied to the second grid 20 and the third grid 30
