This invention relates generally to service seals for sealing a hole formed in a wall of a tire, and more particularly to a seal wherein the interior of the tire can be accessed through the hole for service purposes. When a hole is formed in the wall of a tire, it is necessary to seal the hole to prevent air from escaping and the like. The hole is normally sealed by placing a plug in the hole and forcing a glue such as polyurethane into the hole to fill the interior of the tire and cause a seal between the hole and the plug. The plug is normally secured to the tire by a staple or the like. This is satisfactory for many purposes; however, after the tire has been in service for an extended period of time, it has been found that the glue or other sealant material tends to deteriorate, resulting in holes in the tire after the plug has been removed. It is desirable to have a seal which will not deteriorate so that the hole can be sealed and the tire repaired. Ketamine increases blood flow in the cerebral cortex in humans. Ketamine hydrochloride was administered intravenously to 14 healthy volunteers. The dose was 0.5 mg/kg body weight and the drug was given intravenously for periods of 6 to 15 min. Spectrophotometrical measurements were performed on the cortex of the brain by the measurement of the optical density at a wavelength of 550 nm. A significant increase in cortical blood flow was observed in all cases. There was a close positive correlation between the ketamine plasma level and the change in cortical blood flow.
