Richard Brautigan. Trout Fishing in America. City Lights Books. 1970. I've been reading Brautigan's Trout Fishing in America for a few years now, and I like it a lot. Still, I didn't know much about the poet before I picked it up. I immediately liked the poems in The Pill Versus the Springhill Mine Disaster because Brautigan has a definite sense of humor and a quick wit. He's very good on the long descriptive lines and the short clipped ones, but then again so is T. S. Eliot. His characters aren't real, either. He turns the whole world into a character. And he's very good with the phrase. For example, when a police officer discovers a body in a car trunk, the officer says, "It looks like a pretty good car trunk ... it's got nice wooden handles and hinges, and ... it's got about forty-two hatboxes sitting there..." He gets the point across, yet is still funny because we know the trunk probably didn't actually have any hatboxes. It's just as well as the really good hatboxes were probably stolen. On the other hand, Brautigan's take on the larger issues of the night is, well, less well taken. Maybe he wasn't really interested in that sort of thing. He's a poet, and poetry doesn't really go hand-in-hand with reality. In any case, his central point is that the U.S. should invade Cuba, though he never actually does that. The U.S. should invade Cuba because it loves Cuba! Cuba
