Microstrip technology is widely used for making antennas in the 1-2 GHz frequency range. Typically, a continuous conductor runs in close proximity to a dielectric substrate, with an air gap maintained between the substrate and the conductor. As illustrated in U.S. Pat. No. 4,943,130, a relatively short microstrip antenna is known which may be formed of one-half or one-quarter wavelength of the UHF frequency of operation. The antenna coil is formed of printed conductors with the turns of the coil being closely spaced and the conductors being connected to ground at their ends and forming a loop at their center. The circumference of the loop is one-half or one-quarter wavelength of the UHF frequency. This one-quarter wavelength antenna coil provides a good radiation pattern of a focused field radiating perpendicularly from the antenna. The planar array antennas which are known are typically linear structures with slots which are grouped into a square, or other structure which is spaced in a parallel relationship, and are coupled together through an RF feed network to the UHF transceiver. The slotted array antenna may be constructed with as many as 36 slots, each slot being formed with a different length and being coupled to the transceiver through the feed network. If a slotted array is
