Dropout is a Windows application that can instantly search a given location for specified files and content, and display results. It's handy for those times when you know little to nothing about the file you're looking for, and can take a little while to get used to. Source File: Anytime you install a new application, you're going to get a barrage of information that you don't know anything about. This is where search engines come in handy, searching through the various items installed on your system.

Here are a few free search engines you can try to help you search out information about your applications, or to search out information about applications, or all applications. 1. Google Google is the original search engine, and is still one of the most popular search engines around, it is also extremely useful, as almost everyone has heard of it. That being said, in my experience, it is more difficult to use than other search engines, and I don't like it very much. Pros: Free A good selection of searches The Google Chrome extension is available for download Advanced search options Can search by file name Cons: Still just a browser extension Searches take a while Google is not compatible with all browsers 2. Bing Bing is much more friendly to use than Google, and unlike Google, it does not conflict with other programs that are installed on your system. It's also much faster than Google, which is good, if you're in a hurry to find information about your applications. Pros: Great to use on the go Can search by file name Can search by content Cons: Does not work with all browsers The interface can be a bit confusing Searches are not as good as Google 3. Yahoo I haven't used Yahoo, but if you like search engines that can fit on a phone, it should be fun to use. I've been told that it is good for finding applications. Pros: Can search by file name Can search by content Can search by application Searches are a lot of fun Cons: Quiet, and may be a bit too difficult There's no interface Most searches are not very good There are a few other search engines out there

This way, no installation is required, so you can run it once you've downloaded it, and save its location in the past. Once the application is installed, you'll be given the choice to open a new search session, or go into an advanced search mode. It's in the advanced mode where you can find the interface you'll always have access to when looking for files or content on the host machine. The database is made of limited entries, but this can be increased with the help of the content manager. Search criteria include the file of interest, date modified, filename, size, name, and location. To find the file inside it, you just need to input the name of the content itself, followed by location information, and you're done. Using the unique application, you can also find the file of interest by looking for file modifications. On this case, you can input a modified date, and optionally a range between dates, so you can look for the file as recently as a day ago, or as long as you want. The application is also rather simple to use. You can type in your search criteria, and the interface that follows will do the rest. Once the engine scans the host, results are displayed, and you can jump to the source files, or look for the content you want. Search the web for what you need on the go. It's fast, and it works. Drag and drop the file name into the text field, or simply type the file name and start searching. With the advanced mode, you need to start typing the search term you want. Alongside the results, there's a tooltip that gives some extra information, and suggestions that help to refine your search string. The Simple mode is less user-friendly, because it's more limited to the file name, and content. It's also rather restricted to the template for inputting the search term. There's also no real option to choose the engine, so it defaults to stock options. Dropout Features: 1. Simple and Advanced 2. Fast! 3. Instantly Finds the File 4.
