The important ones are -w KEYFILE and -w DEFAULT. If -w is not set, then a file named $HOME/.oamrc (or one with similar default settings) is used instead. To use the switches, you must have the program installed for them to work. There should be no need to debug any of these switches, unless you are doing so for an unusual reason. Run the script, make sure the output looks as expected and that the right switches are used, and if all went well, then remove the script. What KEYFILE is supposed to do: For each user who has logged into the system there will be a ~/.oamrc file. This contains the keyfile used for user switching; if the file is missing, then a default keyfile is generated which you can use to avoid problems with scripts from other users. If the -w KEYFILE switch is used, then the keyfile provided by -w KEYFILE is used instead of the default one, otherwise the keyfile used will be the one found in the .oamrc file. If the ~/.oamrc file does not exist, or does not contain the required keyfile, then -w KEYFILE defaults to the standard directory keyfile, which is always $HOME/.oamrc. DEFAULT The use of -d DEFAULT is to
