If there were something that they should be doing differently or things that they would change, they would tell you what they thought was important. I tend to bring in a huge volume of people when I would deliver products to them so I could get feedback from the people who had worked with the product to try to gauge what it was like. Again, this isn't different from the kinds of evaluation methodologies that retail marketers are likely using. The other thing that was slightly different that I took away from my week at Betamax was the focus on generating a lot of "quality comments". In the betamax world, comments are called user feedback. That's the form of feedback we tend to hear from social media platforms. The idea was that you should generate a lot of comments because they are the only form of feedback that is free. That does tend to change as you progress into a mature organization. The other thing that I learned about about feedback is that it is one of the more difficult activities to organize and it's not easy to find that balance between providing enough information and not so much that people overwhelm you with information that you don't need. I don't know that we really found a great solution to this. It was really a case of making sure that the product development team was giving the right feedback and always being mindful of how much information you are asking for. What is the difference between good and bad feedback? You should try to have as few stakeholders involved in the process as possible They typically try to have stakeholders involved in every step of the process and they try to make it as much of a public process as possible.

My MCU is being loaded with several EPROMs. With my previous logic analyzer I saw that this load occurs in a continuous loop. I'm not sure what exactly is going on, but for example I saw that one bit changes between 0 and 1 every two or three loops. I was wondering how to clear the NAND with minimum power dissipation, since
