Concerto for flute and orchestra (1988).Q: Resource file (.resx) not auto-resolving to its equivalent string values I am building a WPF application in C#. I have a base class library which has a.resx file containing some static resource properties and string values. In the code-behind of my main window, I want to display properties from the.resx file. I did this by using: string propName =....; string propValue =

Properties.Resources.ResourceManager.GetString(propName); However, when I compile, I get an error saying that I am trying to use a resource identifier that does not exist in my project. This is because it is expecting a string literal, which is good, however I am not sure how to resolve this problem. The.resx file is a file embedded in the project, as opposed to being external to the project and updated after build time. How do I resolve this? A: If you have your string resources in the same assembly as your.exe application then the default resource resolution rules would be to use the assembly resource. This can be done like this: `string propName = ....; using (var stream = Assembly.GetExecutingAssembly().GetManifestResourceStream(propName)) using (var reader = new StreamReader(stream)) { string propValue = reader.ReadToEnd(); }`
