On top of the live game engine, Pro Mode, FIFA Ultimate Team and FIFA Ultimate Team Seasons have been updated to support the new gameplay system. These updates will be rolled out gradually over the coming weeks and months, with the Live Player Motion data used in FIFA Ultimate Team Seasons becoming available as early as next week. "Today, we've introduced the next generation of FIFA gameplay and features. In our vision, the best FIFA will have fluid, instinctive and fluid gameplay from kickoff to the final whistle," said Richard James, Executive Vice President, EA SPORTS. "Our goal is to provide players a game that combines the best of all aspects of FIFA, including visual, cognitive and physiological aspects of the sport. We've been working on the FIFA gameplay system for more than eight months, and with every new feature, we're looking for feedback from our players. We know there's a lot of interest in our next-generation FIFA gameplay, and we're constantly evaluating the product and listening to our player community." This new FIFA gameplay system was designed in partnership with a handful of leading scientists, including physiologist David Williams, PhD, who has more than 30 years of athletic science and exercise physiology research, and Mike Zarren, PhD, a Professor of Biomedical Engineering and Director of the Sports Medicine Research Program at the University of Pittsburgh. "We've spent months studying the biomechanics of soccer and football in order to create FIFA's next-generation gameplay system," added Zarren. "The new Pro Mode, animation improvements, Physiological Systems and responsive play feature were all designed with our science at the forefront to provide the most realistic and fun FIFA experience." The team of designers and scientists at EA Tiburon believe that today's FIFA players understand the sport of football well, but they're looking to enhance the overall soccer experience. FIFA's gameplay engine, however, was created from the very start with the idea of making the sport of football fun, dynamic and engaging in its purest form. "FIFA gameplay is more than just running around a virtual pitch and kicking balls," said Zarren. "Our goal was to study the biomechanics of soccer at a high-intensity to allow the game's creators to recreate that authentic pace and intensity of the sport in the engine itself."
