Candidate: During my Ph.D. studies, I developed a unique method to examine the effects of behavioral treatment of cocaine addiction on functional MRI (fMRI) signal dynamics and cortical- subcortical connectivity as measured in the blood-oxygen-level dependent (BOLD) fMRI signal in abstinent patients with cocaine addiction. I acquired fMRI data at baseline and at repeated two-hour visits over a two month period in patients who completed cocaine treatment. I found that abstinent patients who achieved treatment response showed significant increases in cortical-subcortical resting state connectivity and significant decreases in BOLD fMRI signal fluctuations compared to patients who did not achieve treatment response. This finding points to a significant change in the dynamics of functional connections between brain regions with abstinence, and suggests that fMRI signal dynamics is sensitive to changes in chronic behavioral therapy. This work lays the foundation for my career goals: a) to study the mechanisms of treatment response in cocaine addiction using fMRI; b) to examine the relationship between changes in regional BOLD signal dynamics and cortical-subcortical circuitry in acute and chronic treatment; and c) to test the hypothesis that these dynamics predict clinical outcome. Research Background: Cocaine use is one of the most prevalent mental health disorders and the acute and chronic processes of cocaine addiction are most likely mediated by interactions between prefrontal and limbic structures. Animal studies and human neuroimaging studies in chronic cocaine abusers have demonstrated alterations in prefrontal and limbic regions, which may underlie the perception of craving and the reward system underactivation associated with excessive cocaine use. The current proposals seek to further examine the mechanisms of treatment response in cocaine addiction using fMRI. The research component of this proposal seeks to determine if resting-state fMRI connectivity is a marker of treatment response and if the changes in connectivity mediate the clinical impact of treatment response. A longitudinal study design is used in this proposal to minimize the potential effects of recall and false-memory confound. Moreover, this study will also enable direct examination of the relationships between functional connectivity and cognitive response to treatment. The ultimate goal of this proposal is to advance our understanding of the neurobiological basis of cocaine addiction through development of more efficacious treatments, and evaluation of
