Tumor cells frequently lose control over cell cycle checkpoints, which are programmed to ensure that normal cells undergo apoptosis in response to DNA damage. Most tumors use multiple, redundant routes to achieve this, and several broad classes of anticancer drugs inhibit cell cycle checkpoint signaling, leading to accumulation of cells with unrepaired DNA. In addition, many tumor cells overexpress specific components of the cell cycle checkpoint response, and these may be key targets in both the treatment of cancer and other diseases. In this review, we discuss the signaling pathways that control cell cycle checkpoints, what is known about their expression in cancer and disease, and which genetic lesions or molecules are currently being developed to target them as anticancer drugs. The current understanding and the needs for future work is discussed for each pathway. "A transgender student at the Roman Catholic elementary school I attend was once scheduled for castration, by a judge who signed the petition. Think about that. A child was declared a danger to himself by a man who is trained to be a minister of the government.
